

WHAT DO WE WANT TO CREATE?

What I have observed is that the majority of people are addicted to bad news. And, it is because the neural pathways of the human brain become accustomed to the chemicals of our conditioned minds. In the past, the television news stations would choose to report bad news, because if they didn't, their ratings would go down. If we as citizens of this country want to improve the quality of our lives, we need to be willing to accept good news, to believe that things can get better, and to change our minds about the nature of our shared reality. If we collectively agree that the world is going to hell in a handbasket, and that things are only destined to get worse, that the relationship between the human race and the earth is on a downward spiral with a trajectory that cannot be altered, that climate change is upon us so we might as well all go for broke anyway, then that is the direction the majority of the population will continue to go. If we collectively agree that the human race (Team Human) is like the underdog in a hockey match down in the third period and coming back for a surprise win, then that is the direction our shared trajectory will take.

When we sigh in resignation and decide ahead of time that "that's the way it is, and that's the way it will always be," because that is the way it has been so far, we succumb to the oppression the human race has survived for many thousands of years. Emotionally, we have every reason to be grumpy about our shared context of unconsciousness. Intellectually, we cannot deny the course of human history points to our continued evolution into greater and greater degrees of collective health. For example, it used to be that human beings had an average life span of 35 years, and now we have "super-agers" that enjoy excellent health in their 90's with brains that are as nimble and healthy as anyone in their 20's. It used to be that incest was tolerated and progeny resulted with bad genes, and now we know better than to marry our cousins. It used to be that we did not have any science and math and philosophy, and now we have lots of that taught in schools. The human race is evolving intellectually, emotionally, spiritually, and physically, and this evolution is a law of nature than cannot be denied after a brief overview of our advances in technology over the last 200 years.

If you think that the human race is doomed to continue on a downward spiral of habitat destruction, increased pollution, over-population, poverty, violence, and the range of other imbalances resulting from the human creative sexual power base manifesting our unconsciousness, you are wrong, just plain wrong. The reason why I know for a fact that things will get better in the United States is that the end of patriarchy is nigh. Patriarchy is a system in which mothers are unable to protect their children from sexual predators. We can live in a country in which no child is being unlawfully penetrated on U.S. soil.

The reason why we live in a male-dominated society is that enough men have been damaged from perpetrating sexual violence that they feel worthless, and their hidden pain gets in the way of them feeling like they have love to give. Wounded men and women resort to a platform of domination because they lack the power to share in the context of a power-sharing dynamic between males and females. Now that we are evolving as a society to recognize the oppression within gender roles, and how absolutely de-humanizing it is to engage in sensitivity shaming of the male, which is counter-productive to our evolutionary strategy as humans because the male sensitivity is a gift that lends itself to increased awareness, this changes everything.

The human race was thrown off track a long time ago, and we have been slowly moving in the direction of getting back on track, which has been marked by our stages of evolution. It used to be that we relied on gas lamps for lighting, now we have fluorescent lightbulbs. Technology does not reliably reflect our increase in consciousness, as modern science has at times been an outlet to express the trauma the entire human race has sustained. Yet so much scientific research has produced good medicine that has reduced or eliminated diseases that we cannot deny the solutions are within reach.

In the past, the human race was so backwards that we collectively agreed that a man beating his wife was something to be tolerated; nowadays, we have evolved into a civilized society in which violence towards men, women, and children is prosecuted in the court of law. The phrase “rule of thumb” originated from the common law that men were allowed to beat their wives with a stick as long as the stick was not wider than his thumb. We as a human race have collectively evolved to a higher level of emotional maturity in which we now acknowledge that type of behavior is barbaric, which is why we have outlawed assault and battery. We as a human race have also evolved enough at this point in human history in order to recognize pedophilia as a physically contagious disease that can be treated with immunity shots based on researching the chemical reactions that turn some victims of child sexual abuse into perpetrators.

It used to be that the shame was so deep and the trauma so severe that we weren’t intact enough to even talk about it; nowadays, the human race has evolved such strong survivors of childhood sex abuse that as adults they can move past their fear and their shame to confide in their trusted loved ones, or a therapist, or to a partner. The progress of our collective health as a species is steadily improving. The reason why pedophilia has not been formally acknowledged as a contagious disease is that the emotional impact is so severe that up until a few generations ago we as a society couldn’t even talk about it. We are even stronger now. Each generation of humans born is smarter and faster than their ancestors, and we have figured out how to support the health and well-being of members of our species in new and improved ways.

Ask your doctor to call the Center for Disease Control to request that pedophilia be declared a contagious disease and a biological weapon in need of quarantine. There is already plenty of evidence that some victims of childhood sex abuse become perpetrators of sexual violence themselves, and those that do not become perpetrators often continue to suffer the pain of the abuse long after it has stopped as their abusers continue to get off on what they did. If all the pedophiles were taken off the street and put into quarantine, whether it be in prison or in a treatment facility, and given reversible chemical castration, the survivors of childhood sex abuse would experience great relief.

Countries like Taiwan enjoy streets free of litter because they have imposed such strict penalties (they used to cane people for littering, now it’s something like a $2000 fine) that as a culture littering is not accepted. The United States can be the first country to completely eliminate littering on children’s bodies, as there is a new technology available that can end the doubts and confusion of “he said, she said” within the courtroom, and it can also be used to locate and identify anyone who has perpetrated sexual violence towards children that has not yet been reported to the police.

If this new technology were to be adopted by federal law enforcement, the upwards of $300 million dollar industry of human trafficking in the United States could be wiped out within weeks. If you notice thoughts in your head saying, "It's never going to happen," in regards to reaching the goal of no child being unlawfully penetrated on U.S. soil, you might wonder what your loyalty to patriarchy is based upon. Would American children be "too safe" for your comfort, or would it be the women enjoying too high a level of safety? There was $175 million dollars of federal funding spent on consultations for a CRC bridge that was never built, but you don't have the technology to locate the psychopaths that run around raping children? You will have this technology soon, as soon as enough people digest this awareness and require law enforcement to use every option available to fight crime.
